P. Raja's My Father's Bicycle: A Nostalgic Recollection of Pre-digital India

Jyothi Susan Abraham

Colonial and postcolonial worlds enthralled the pages of researchers, anthropologists, psychoanalysts, elite thinkers and activists who were engrossed in deciphering answers to the questions related to reconstructed or altered societies. Many of these locations of discussions have accustomed themselves to the permanent cultural changes and moved onto graver challenges that further erase their unique cultural identity. The ubiquitous digital world of multimedia has overpowered all other issues and has initiated a new design in societal behavioral pattern drawing visible lines in history to divide the pre-digital and the post-digital worlds.

Raja's short stories transports the post-digital reader to the pre-digital India reminding the past without pretensions and overstatements of events, locations, culture and emotions showcased in the narration. The stories ruminate sweetness of family life with all its perfections. The narrator happens to be a male in most of the stories and include wife, children, friends, neighbours and colleagues set in comfortable locations in the generally accepted social structure. The complacent characters seldom roam outside the contours of morality and religion. The gadget free world of the stories lures the reader to the idyll of yesterdays when the husband and wife had time for each other, their children and even the dog. Set in semi-urban villages, the stories profuse the aroma of traditional men and women and their middle class existence.
