UGC Foundation Programme on Human Rights Education-Syllabus

Rationale: -Human Rights (HR) has been an established subject and a critical domain of politics for more than half a century. The concept and concerns of HR have, however, been expanding during the last three hundred years incorporating a wide range of subjects and rights, which transcend political, ideological, and cultural differences/peculiarities of the countries as well as the peoples across the world. The post-war international system has further witnessed the emergence of a world HR culture with liberty, emancipation, education, and universalism as integral components of that culture.

The field of HR studies with its characteristic inter-related disciplinary concerns of politics, development, civil society, gender, environment, law, justice etc., and encompassing a wide spectrum of national, international and non-governmental/non-state actors, has brought forth a world wide web of disciplinary concerns such as Political Science, Development studies, Gender studies, Environmental studies, Ethnic studies, Subaltern studies, Conflict Resolution and Peace studies, Disarmament studies etc. This is certainly a vast and expanding domain of social and political research particularly in the context of the changes currently underway in the global matrix of trade and political economy. The academic programme attempts to grapple with this vast corpus of knowledge and ground level realities of HR while focusing on the global and national concerns of HR, peace, order, equality, justice, etc.

The programme of Human Rights is so designed as to facilitate and encourage both theoretical and empirical studies, thereby setting a background for students to have greater interest in HR. The objective here is to generate a deep and critical awareness among the students about the HR question in its national and international dimensions.

The rationale behind the programme is to enable the students to acquire conceptual clarity and develop respect for human rights norms and values, and make the learners sensitive to the weaker and the vulnerable sections of society. A full understanding of international and national standards and mechanism for realization and enforcement of rights will be promoted. Apart from that (1) to appreciate the growing importance of HR both as an academic enterprise as well as a concern of the contemporary era in all its aspects;(2) to critically evaluate the contending theories of HR;(3) to analyze the social concerns such as development, gender, ecology, and civil society within a HR perspective; and (4) to choose and construct an appropriate design for an empirical investigation of a HR case from a local level experience.
